

ANDREW (“DREW”) ERDMANN

Andrew “Drew” Erdmann is a Principal with McKinsey & Company’s Washington, D.C. office. He works with public sector defense, development, and intelligence organizations, often at the intersection of economics and national security. He has extensive experience operating in fragile and post-conflict states, including Afghanistan and Iraq. He is a leader of the McKinsey Strategy Practice’s Global Forces Service Line, where he focuses upon the implications of long-term trends shaping the international business and economic landscape. He also has experience in the aerospace and defense, high technology, retail, and basic materials industries.

Between 2001 and 2005, Drew served in the U.S. Government as a member of Secretary of State’s Policy Planning Staff, Senior Advisor to the Ministry of Higher Education & Scientific Research in Iraq, and, lastly, Director for Iran, Iraq, and Strategic Planning on the National Security Council staff at the White House. He has also taught international affairs at Harvard University and George Washington University, and written on U.S. national security policy in The New York Times, The American Interest, and other publications. He has served as a consultant to the U.S. Army, the Department of Defense, and the Department of State, as well as an expert advisor to the Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group.

After receiving his first B.A. from Williams College and then a second B.A. from Oxford University as a Carroll Wilson Fellow, Drew received an A.M. and Ph.D. in history from Harvard University. He is a life member of the Council on Foreign Relations and a member of the International Institute for Strategic Studies.
